Social Awareness

FOR CAMPS PARKS AND RECREATION

Participating in camps and recreational activities is vital for autistic children, fostering social skills, routine development, and sensory integration. These activities promote independence, friendship, and exposure to new experiences, boosting self-esteem. Inclusive camps support acceptance of differences and offer families valuable respite, contributing to overall well-being and personal growth for neurodivergent children and youth.

Why take this training?

Every child deserves the chance to attend camps and engage in recreational activities. These experiences contribute to the formation of friendships and the creation of lasting memories.

Incorporate Autism Canada into your neurodiversity and inclusion training for camp leaders, staff, and recreational coaches, promoting an inclusive experience for everyone involved.
